

Performance Notes

Instrumentation

Aristeia is written for a solo percussionist playing three sets of three instruments. Specific instrumentation is left up to the performer, within the following bounds:

- All percussion is unpitched
- Each set of three instruments must be chosen from the same family, arranged in rough low to high order
- Each set of three must be from a different instrument family
- All instruments should be playable with the same beaters or mallets
- The sustain and decay for all instruments should be fairly quick

For example, one possible instrumentation would be three toms, three wood blocks, and three table cymbals

Grace Notes

Grace notes are always played before the beat, including grace notes that precede a rest.

Dynamics

Dynamics in Aristeia are notated in a range from pp to ff. These should be taken to define the desired sharpness of attack, rather than the resultant sound.

Articulations

Marcato signifies a noticeable accent.

Tenuto signifies a slight accentuation of the note. This is meant to be felt by the player more than it is necessary for the audience to hear it.

No other notes should be accented. Meter in Aristeia is a function of phrasing and organization, not pulse.

Tuplets

Tuplets are notated by a bracket and a single number, as below.

Throughout Aristeia, the tuplet number defines the number of 32nd notes to be played in the space of an eighth note.

That is, $\text{—}X\text{—}$ should always be read as $\text{—}X:4\text{—}$

* * *

In the conventions of epic poetry, the aristeia (from the Greek word for “excellence”) is a battle scene which describes a hero’s arc in which, often inspired by one of the gods, the hero prepares for battle, single-handedly takes on and defeats a significant number of opponents, and then returns — sometimes alive, sometimes dead — to his camp.

This piece describes four different but overlapping arcs. Each of the three collections of instruments has its own buildup and soloistic moment before retreating into the background, or disappearing. The interplay between these three arcs results in the performer’s own aristeia, as the piece builds in intensity from its simple beginnings to its climax, and finally, a return — leaving the performer happily unharmed — to a reworking of the opening moments.
